Rose was born Ernestine Potowska in Piotrków Trybunalski, Poland, in 1810. Her father was a rabbi, and her mother was a devout Catholic. Rose was raised in a traditional Jewish home, but she rejected the religion of her parents at a young age. She was also a strong advocate for the rights of women.

In 1836, Rose married William Rose, a Polish-born American journalist. The couple moved to the United States in 1839, and they settled in New York City. Rose quickly became involved in the women's rights movement.

She was a founding member of the National Woman Suffrage Association, and she served as the organization's president from 1869 to 1870.

Rose was also a strong advocate for the abolition of slavery. She was a member of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and she spoke out against slavery at numerous public meetings. Rose was also a supporter of the Underground Railroad, and she helped many slaves escape to freedom.

In addition to her work for women's rights and abolition, Rose was also a freethinker. She was a member of the Free Religious Association, and she spoke out against organized religion. Rose believed that religion was a tool of oppression, and she argued that people should be free to think for themselves.

Rose was a controversial figure in her time. She was often criticized for her outspoken views on religion and women's rights. However, she was also a respected and admired leader in the women's rights movement. Rose's work helped to pave the way for women's suffrage and other important advances for women.
