The Munk Debate on China, held in Vancouver, Canada, in October 2022, brought together two distinguished experts to debate key issues surrounding China's role in the world. Peter Navarro, a former White House trade advisor, argued that China poses a significant threat to the West, while Kishore Mahbubani, a former Singaporean diplomat, maintained that China's rise is a positive development for the global community.

Peter Navarro's Argument: China as a Threat

Navarro presented a strong case for viewing China as a grave threat to the West. He argued that China's rapid military expansion, its aggressive territorial claims in the South China Sea, and its increasing economic power are all part of a grand strategy to dominate the world.

Navarro pointed to China's "Belt and Road Initiative" as evidence of its expansionist ambitions. This massive infrastructure project, which aims to connect China to Europe and Africa, is seen by many as a way for China to gain control of key trade routes and establish its economic dominance.

Navarro also argued that China's political system, which he characterized as authoritarian and repressive, is incompatible with Western values and poses a threat to democracy around the world.

Kishore Mahbubani's Argument: China as a Partner

In contrast to Navarro's pessimistic view, Mahbubani argued that China's rise is a positive development for the global community. He pointed to China's economic growth, which has lifted millions of people out of poverty and created new opportunities for trade and investment.

Mahbubani also argued that China's increasing diplomatic engagement on the world stage is a sign of its growing responsibility and commitment to global cooperation. He pointed to China's role in international organizations such as the United Nations and its efforts to promote peace and stability in regions like the Middle East.

Mahbubani acknowledged that China faces challenges, such as environmental pollution and social inequality, but he expressed confidence that China will be able to overcome these obstacles and emerge as a responsible global partner.
